212 price highs in Europe. Markets clearly breaking resistance. Buy industrials/financials.

There were 212 new 12-month price highs in Europe yesterday, which completely wipes the floor with the 142 highs we had seen previously. This is a very concrete sign that the market breadth should not be ignored. US new highs was a respectable 173 but not as high as we have previously seen.

The volume was very low though and perhaps we can forgive this given that the US was off celebrating Columbus Day. We do need to see volume improving on rallies if we are to remain confident in the uptrend.

Eurozone indices managed to break through the top of the recent consolidation, these levels should now offer support. There is little resistance before 6000 on the Dax although 6600 is a more realistic target. Eurostoxx broke higher as well. The European indices have yet to see new highs though simply because the weakness of sterling is hindering the UK names, new highs by the FTSE100, Mid caps and AIM though so there isn't actually a problem.

In the US, despite the bond market holiday, equities were open and we saw a new closing high by the S&P, we're now watching 1080 – this is the last resistance before 1200 and the head and shoulders target at 1250. TRAN outperformed a bit yesterday, has a bit of a catch up after the recent Dow highs. New high by the S&P financials index.

Emerging markets continue to perform well with Russia extends its gains even further....
